

(Photo: A Neon Graffiti Composite, N. America)

Primal Confusion

Without a shared sense of natural limit with regard to the genders, there is a great danger that mere competition between the sexes may take the place of the complementarity of masculine and feminine principles. And once competition has become the dominant force in relationship, division and fragmentation will necessarily increase to the point that both men and women alike can not help but move, even when sharing the same household, in their own, largely isolated, directions. Children are the ones who are left to suffer—suspended as it were—in the chaotic and empty space which results in between.